Congressman Peter Welch spent a good portion of his schedule Monday touring Barre City and Central Vermont. He says because of all the natural disasters around the country, Congress may need a special appropriation to cover all the losses.

One stop was in the Capital City. As you walk down Main and State Street, things appear to be normal. But it's only when you get into the back of buildings do you find the destruction. One big mess is located at the back of several businesses on State Street. This is day three of the clean up for those who make their living in Montpelier.

"Mud, just muck in the basements...it just floated all around," said Steve Everett, a building owner.

"You are just seeing a prevalence of storm related damage that hurts all of us rural/urban districts. If there is an opportunity to provide extra assistance, we may just have to do that to cover the damage under existing programs there," said Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.)

Rep. Welch says there is likely help for towns, cities and public infrastructure that was damaged in the floods, and there may also be low interest loans available for private businesses that were impacted by the flood.

Governor Shumlin has already asked the President for federal help. That application is pending.
